Wild Cattle Attack Seamen of the Donau.

NOVEL FIGHT ABOARD SHIP

Beef on the Hoof Shiver the loned maker in the Waverley Hall, Timbers of a Man-of-War.

The Austrian cruiser Donau had a held by a herd of bellowing and fight- test with four or five days' preparation. ing wild cattle that the crew had to shoot in self-defense.

The Donau is one of the old-fashioned men-of-war and carries no cold ship her beef on the hoof. She expects tion worked up in crayons. It is a very to sail for Nagasaki today, and there are over three hundred men aboard who must be fed, and who can't get along, without fresh meat. Therefore, as the supply of beef had run short He never swung a driver at the teeon the Donau, it was decided to take aboard about thirty head of cattle. These were ordered, and Monday they were put aboard the training ship. Unluckily, they were not cows, but wild bullocks from the Island of Hawaii. They had never seen a man-ofwar deck before, and when they got aboard of the Donau and perceived the array of weapons and a red thing or two, they thought it was about up to Or tried to make a tropic island freethem to show fight. And they did. Before they could be gotten below into their stalls they took possession of the

One powerful brute lowered his head, shook his horns, bellowed a few times, calling to his mates, and then made a rush for the nearest officer. The officer made quick time up the main rigging. He found that this was a good position from which to direct the pitched battle which followed, and so stayed there that he might see all that went on. Disappointed in not getting young officer on his prongs, the angry bull made a rush for a petty officer, standing near the gangway. The petty officer had read of real bull fights, and immediately did a lively stunt along ing cough, and it has always given the rail on his way to tell the officer perfect satisfaction. It was recomin the rigging something that he had

Meanwhile fury seemed to have se'zed the whole herd, and they not only made attempts to toss all the men in sight, but they commenced to fight among themselves. Confusion prevailed for fifteen or twenty minutes, and the decks ran blood as the result of the infuriated beasts puncturing each other with One bullock of an ambitious turn of mind, made for the captain's cabin and succeeded in getting himself jammed pieces of stew meat out of the entrapped animal's hind quarters. Another beast fell through a skylight and landed below with fragments of stained glass windows sticking in his

Gun-racks were knocked from their fastenings, buckets and ropes and fastenings, buckets and ropes and gear of all kinds became entangled the raging bullocks, and the frightened and fighting anima's went tearing and bellowing around, banging into everything, smashing glass, scratching the deck, bruising themselves on the gun-butts, and chasing any unfortunate marine who chanced to be in sight. The cook thought that a typhoon had struck the harbor, and that the ship's masts were going by the board. He rushed out of the galley with his vaiuables in one hand and a bottle of yeast in the other. When he realized what was going on he threw his bottle of yeast in the middle of the herd of mad cattle, where it exploded between the eyes of one of the mob, and then beat a hasty retreat back to his pots and pans, knowing that he had no right to interfere with anything on

By this time several of the bulls were trying to force their way aft, while others were fighting among themselves, some lying in the agonies of death on the deck.

Venturesome members of the crew were trying to pacify the beasts. One marine, who had been brought up on a farm, crawled along the rail, patted a big bull on the rump and said. "So bos, so bos," or words to that effect, in his language. This didn't work. Things were getting desperate, and it became necessary to adopt heroic measures to stop the fighting among the cattle. Revolvers were drawn and used until many more bullocks lay dead upon the decks, and the others were secured. When the decks were finally cleared worth of damage had been done by the bullocks. Luckily, however, no person was injured.

This is the first time that a man-ofwar has been captured by a herd of cattle since the stock transport Ark, Captain Noah, carried a live cargo
